FROM THE CHRONICLES OF THE SPITZHAUS

In 1622, the Spitzhaus was built as a small vineyard house on the Landsberg vineyard. It replaced a former electoral estate and, due to its elevated location, was initially called the “Hochhaus” (High House). Later, it was also known for a time as the “Hohes Haus.”

Its once-impressive silhouette, crowned by a boldly curved roof, earned it the name Spitzhaus. Elector Johann Georg I is said to have commissioned its construction. The property changed owners frequently, sometimes annually. Until 1657, Mr. Obriste Bose harvested his wine here. In 1668, the merchant Landsberger became its owner. Around 1699, the Spitzhaus belonged to Baron von Rechenberg, and later to the von Wolffranisdorf family, who gifted it on July 24, 1706, to General von Flemmig. Just a year later, it was given to Countess von Cosel.

In 1710, the Countess transferred the estate to her patron, August the Strong, who subsequently hosted magnificent celebrations on the hilltop. August the Strong envisioned incorporating the building as an additional pleasure pavilion, complementing Hoflößnitz Palace. However, it was not until his son, Elector August III, that the building was redesigned in 1749 in the Baroque style by Matthias Daniel Pöppelmann. The upper floor and tower included a hall decorated with paintings, as well as private chambers. Parts of the two original fireplaces still survive today as witnesses to this era.

The guestbook of the Spitzhaus records illustrious visitors, including King Charles X of France, King Otto I of Greece, and Wilhelm I of Prussia (then Crown Prince, later German Emperor). During times of war, the Spitzhaus grounds were used for strategic military purposes.

In 1889, the Saxon court sold the Spitzhaus to the merchant Herrmann Henricke, who added the two wings in 1901/02, giving the house its present appearance. From 1960, the building was used as a holiday home by the state-owned Esda stocking factory. Following German reunification in 1990, it became a private guesthouse again, and after its closure in 1995, it came into the possession of the city of Radebeul. Since 1996, the current owners of the Spitzhaus have sought to continue the estate’s proud traditions.
